way to.SCOTUS says we must go to trial The U.S.
Supreme Court ruled that the Chicago-based Archdiocese of Chicago, which did not appeal, did not have to answer to John Doe v. Archdiocese of Chicago, dealing with the question of whether priests had to report allegations against them to the archdiocese or the police. — In a ruling handed down today, the high court refused to take up the case of John Doe, which challenged Illinois state law regulating sexual harassment claims in the workplace. The high court refused to take up the case in “Church Militant” v. “Church of the Xtian God” because the statute of limitations had not run out. All that remains of the lawsuit is the attorney’s fees of “Doe,” who demanded $5 million in his complaint against the Church of the Xtian God. I’ve never understood why “Doe” went along with the process. After years of countless lawyers, I am stunned by the irony. The Chicago archdiocese and the attorney representing the lawyers had argued that the statute of limitations had expired. However, the high court still affirmed the lower court’s decision that the statute of limitations did not run, although it did not give a specific reason for the decision. Still, the court’s opinion did not give any indication that it would have decided the case the other way. Not only did the court make no comment about the reasoning for its decision, it did not reveal if any justices will join the dissent. The ruling leaves unanswered the question of whether states can infringe on the free exercise of religion. It is a major victory for the archdiocese, although it could be for a number of years. A number of states, most notably Texas and Arizona, did take advantage of the confusion that the lack of a ruling caused and passed legislation specifically dealing with clergy abuse. — That doesn't mean that the issue
